From Boston.com Temperatures in the Boston area hit 90 degrees on Wednesday, the first 90-degree day of the year in the Boston area. But if you're like me, you're still wondering why, when you turned the heat on last week, it came out to more like 70 degrees or 80 degrees, not 90 degrees. Perhaps one of the biggest misconceptions about global warming is that everyone thinks the world is warming. It's not. The recent Midwest heat wave is a good example. It was caused by a jet stream that meandered east of the normal path, cooling the east while heating the west. The normal east-to-west jet stream that normally runs from the Arctic to the tropics has shifted its path, and this shift in path caused the warm spell. As a result of this shift, the polar jet stream was blocked for a few days, cooling down the Midwest and leaving the East Coast a few degrees warmer than normal. While other factors, such as human-caused climate change, may have contributed to the shift of the jet stream, a large part of the shift is due to natural variations of weather patterns. The jet stream, itself a large-scale weather phenomenon, will always shift and shift again. The trend is for the jet stream to continue shifting, bringing more and more of the Midwest into its path. By the end of the century, the jet stream may be in the process of shifting entirely out of the Northeast. 77a5ca646e

Oriented thin films of nonporous carbon for microelectronics. We report experimental and theoretical findings on self-assembled thin films of graphite on nonporous SiO₂ surfaces. Our analysis is based on scanning tunneling microscopy experiments, which showed that the formation of such films is favored by the strong binding energy of adatomlike Si defects at their edges. In the experiments and in the corresponding density-functional calculations, the graphite film follows the curved shape of the substrate while maintaining its original orientational order. This result, together with the excellent compatibility between graphite and SiO₂, opens up the perspective of three-dimensional integration schemes. 55. Is a prime number?
