Editor's comment:

My mission to smuggle drugs into the US has now taken an unexpected turn. Mass media organ Raptor just reported on the latest smuggling scandal: the CEO of the world's largest military contractor the US is planning not only to weaponize C:/live/live but he's trying to put it into one of the world's most-trusted tactical engagement games. Call it the King of the Border, the game started as a free iOS game with a pseudo-historical rendering which rendered better than most AAA games you can buy on iOS and Android... But it quickly branched off into a free online RPG show, a massive roguelike beat-em-up, and now a shooting game. The goal is to infiltrate the US border, armed with mostly enhanced CCW Steiner pistols, when you don't know which federal agent is your pursuer.

Here's the original raw PC build, and video review. I'll try to put together some more comprehensive coverage and review it more thoroughly for you soon.

What's new:

NC&W #149 (March, 1908) I found this photograph in a group of Paid Union Workers who have a "just grievance" at the Triangle Cable Mill in Lowell. This was taken early in 1908 with the employees being interviewed about their plight. Unfortunately for the men, their troubles were just beginning. The Durham Textile Company had long been pushing the workers to repudiate the unionization of their employees. The company not only provided the wages, but was also magnifying its profits by increasing the width of looms. In May, 1907, a large group of employees at Durham Textile, in the Salem Textile Mill, voted to unionize. Previously most of the factories had been rented by the Triangle Company, but at Durham Textile the employers were actually competing with other textile companies in Macon, Georgia. To force "going unionized" on Durham would be to be harnessed to the big machine companies in Georgia. The Mill Owners Association, and then the Canadian Cotton Mill Corporation and the similar Central Silk Company, in order to prevent unionization drove the looms off the to the finest factory of the Triangle. In the fall of 1907 a company named the Canadian Cotton Manufacture Company gained a foothold in the Maine textile industry. On January 18, 1908, a reporter for the "Chattanooga Times" called at Durham Textile and discovered a new building. The builders and builders' contractor hadn't left, but the workers were in a frenzy to start construction. In early April their paycheck was held up and they were told to get their own equipment. While a meeting was called to hear the grievances, their employment was cancelled. On May 9 the new mill was to hear in court the suit of the union, which had sued to have the work performed under union conditions. The workers only suffered more, for the company began to cut down on the production capacity of the mills. They pulled down the walls over looms and finished factories. One of the mills, named the Cumberland, was ripped down in late May to have its equipment disposed of. The following is a record of a meeting that was held on May 18, 1908 by the Washington Mill Workers which was synonymous with the Durham Textile workers and was assembled this day
