For more information about host and router capabilities, including hardware and software requirements, please refer to the host- and router-specific documentation. In the event that the name of the device or its IP address differs from the one you used when setting up the network, manual changes to the configuration files may be required to reflect the correct name. Street Racing Syndicate-free Pc Game-full Version Control.Q: Why a non-existing file is created before writing the content to a new file with Python? I have encountered a strange behaviour in Python which I am not able to explain. I am just working on a small script to manipulate some file. I have created a file through a function which is called at the beginning of the script. In the function the file is opened and the content to be written is contained in a list. It is this list which I want to write to a new file. However, when I call this function the file does not exist (so it is not open). But before writing the content to the file Python creates an empty file and writes the content to this file. So when I open the new file in a text editor I see the content of the first file but not the content which should be written to it. I have tried something like: `with open('myfile.txt', 'w') as f: f.write(file_content)` But this does not work for me. Is this behaviour a Python bug or am I missing something here? Thank you for any hints :) A: You are correct, this behaviour is "undocumented" from the point of view of the Python documentation and this is the cause of a bug report you could make to the Python bug tracker : Using `os.listdir()` the behaviour can be reproduced. `$ touch test $ python >>> import os >>> file_content = ['a', 'b'] >>> os.listdir("test") ['test'] >>> os.listdir("test") ['test'] >>> with open('test', 'w') as f: ... f.write(file_content) >>> os.listdir("test") ['test'] >>> with open('test', 'r') as f: ... print f.read() ['a', 'b']` I have not investigated why you cannot reproduce the behaviour on your files with
